The Visible Koi

The koi body functions in a very unique way, with each important organ serving a particular function.

Barbel — These act like koi taste buds.

Brain — Set just above and behind the eyes, which provide koi with excellent vision, the brain runs all bodily processes.

Gills — Through these, carbon dioxide is released into the water and oxygen is collected by red blood cells. The gill tissue sheds ammonia.

Heart — The three chambers (atrium, ventricle and sinus venosus) pump deoxygenated blood to the gills.

Liver — This large organ stores food for distribution to the tissues. It breaks down unwanted proteins into ammonia, forms bile from old or nonfunctioning red blood cells and breaks down toxins and poisons.

Spleen — This stores immature red blood cells and produces cells of the immune system.

Intestine — Food is digested here (koi have no stomach), by enzymes, and nourishes the blood supply.

Swimbladder — Sound waves are processed here, then linked to the inner ear, enabling the koi to hear.

Gonads — These sex glands are situated on either side of the body.

Vent — Urine, excrement, eggs and sperm (milt) are all released here.
